From letters arriving from Europe an interesting story has been disclosed of a contention between diplomats of Soviet Russia and Lithuania. This story, pieced together by Dr. Matthew J. Colney, a prominent Waterbury, Connecticut Lithuanian, concerns the burglarizing of the Lithuanian legation's property in Paris by Russian diplomatic officials.

After Russia's occupation of Lithuania last June and the formation of a new government, Soviet officials ordered Lithuanian ministers and consuls to turn over their legations and consulates to the nearest Soviet officials and leave. Among those receiving such orders was Petras Klimas, the Lithuanian minister in Paris. The French government did not recognize the occupation of Lithuania, but it is believed German pressure made it force the Lithuanians to give up their property and titles.

Keys Surrendered

It was on August 25 that the Lithuanian Legation in Paris remitted its keys to the representative of the French government, who turned them over to the Soviet embassy. According to the story received here the Soviet officials immediately went to inspect the new loot.

"They found only the empty rooms of the Legation and profanities inscribed in handwriting on the walls. They were displeased. They searched for the the storage house where precious objects would be hidden. In this they were aided by a fifth columnist Lithuanian stenographer of the Legation who had been bribed some time earlier during the preparation for the occupation of Lithuania. A Legation stenographer was well informed in those days. This stenographer also knew where the personal property of the Lithuanian minister, his family and members of the Legation, was stored. Early on the morning of August 31st, five or six Soviet officials in Paris fell upon a private garage in rue Mountchain. It was very early morning, not a soul on the streets, no policemen... the job was done quickly, in a way reminiscent of Chicago gangsters... So it seems the Russian Embassy accomplished a unique act, the only one of its kind in diplomatic history—it resorted to gangster tactics in breaking the laws of a foreign country and protected the booty with diplomatic immunity.
